

Acknowledgments

This book condenses four years of research and enthusiasm carried out with a diverse community of friends, comrades and colleagues. A big part of my inspiration comes from all of the people that I have met and worked with across Europe from 2004 to 2008.

This work would not exist without Geert Lovink's encouragement and tireless efforts to establish a dynamic cultural scene in the Netherlands and along the networks of media criticism. Geert's ongoing brainstorming sessions and discussions and his role as concept developer and connoisseur of 'European nihilism' are behind many intuitions of this book. At the Institute of Network Culture in Amsterdam I thank Sabine Niederer for the constant incitation and support aimed to civilize my workflow, and Ned Rossiter for the friendship and solidarity along all these years and email exchanges. At NAI Publishers in Rotterdam I thank Barbera van Kooij and D'Laine Camp for following and fine-tuning the book. As my editor, I would especially like to thank Michael Dieter in Melbourne for turning an obscure manuscript into a readable text.

This book would have been materially impossible without the support of Stefano Harney, my supervisor at Queen Mary University of London and partner in enogastronomic crimes, whose generosity and curiosity gave me an intellectual freedom quite unique in the academic world. I'd also like to thank all my colleagues and friends at the Queen Mary University, one of the most unconventional and lively communities in British academia, which Stefano Harney and Gerard Hanlon have ingeniously put and kept together. I owe a big thanks in particular to Arianna Bove. Firstly, as many of us feel, for her tireless efforts in translating contemporary Franco-Italian political philosophy into English and making it available outside the predictable academic schemes on the archive generationonline.org. Secondly, for her editorial and theoretical help in all of the stages of the development of this manuscript.

Along with Arianna I would like to acknowledge Paolo Do, Gigi Roggero, Francesco Raparelli, Raúl Sánchez and all the comrades from Esc Atelier in Rome for their energy and enthusiasm – as they represent one of the few healthy and stimulating political communities in Europe. Across projects like Uninomade and Edufactory, I express my gratitude also for the ideas I shared with Christian Marazzi, Maurizio Lazzarato, Paolo Virno, Sandro Mezzadra and Antonella Corsani. Particular gratitude goes to Franco ‘Bifo’ Berardi, with whom I first started to investigate the ‘psychopathologies’ of Western culture many years ago through the mailing list Rekombinant.

To Franco La Cecla I owe thanks for his precious bibliographic advice and the method of reverse anthropology applied to the Western metropolis and to the animism of media. Similarly, I owe a huge thanks to Katrien Jacobs for our common projects, investigations and trips in the underground of queer subcultures, I learned much about the necessity of radical experimentations that question our own body identity from her. To my friend Luca Martinazzoli and to his virtuous incursions cutting across the art world, economic theories, gonzo journalism and urban subcultures I am indebted for crucial insights given at different stages of this research. I want to also remember the Amsterdam community closer to me that is still waiting for a proper involvement on my side: Eric Kluitenberg, Patrice Riemens, Merijn Oudenampsen and Sebastian Olma for their useful suggestions and pleasant discussions.

Despite the distance, a warm thanks goes to my family and to the working, farming, cooking and hunting class that I never left – my in-born antidote against the radical chic and the solid material ground on which the understanding of the notion of ‘nature’ of this book is built.

I dedicate this book to Wietske Maas, in front of who my existential nomadism suddenly abdicated and found a port between the bridges of Amsterdam. It is thanks to her virgin gaze and art of the living matter that I found a vita nova and also reconciled my work with a more vivid experience of nature. Indeed, the medieval concept of bestiary behind this book was conceived in our everyday alchemic studio, like countless other ideas and who knows how many creatures yet to come.
